Savona is an Italian city located in the north-west of the country.

Ancient settlement of the Ligurian Sabacians, the city was an ally of Carthage in the Second Punic War against the Roman Empire. Former settlement of the Ligurian Sabacians, the city was an ally of Carthage in the second Punic war against the Roman Empire that finally subdued Savona around 180 B.C. and gave it the name of Savo Oppidum Alpinum. Centuries later, during the rule of Charlemagne's Franks, Savona experienced a period of great economic and commercial expansion. However, its period of maximum splendor took place in the 15th century, giving it the name of “City of the Popes”. This is because one of the most influential families of the city, the Della Rovere, had among its members two of the successors of St. Peter: Francesco della Rovere (Sixtus IV), and his nephew Giuliano Della Rovere (Julius II). The first, promoter of the Sistine Chapel; the second, patron of Michelangelo, Bramante and Raphael.
